In the new version of the site, the action buttons have their own bar, and the menu titles are in between menu sections.

The main contents of the menu are displayed in a grid pattern. There is a scrollable container wrapping multiple grids, one for each menu section. Each item on the menu has its own layout box, which has a column structure. The layout box should expand with the content, so longer descriptions will fit.

Content in the column element containing each menu item is centered horizontally.

The add to cart button and price belong to a row element. As do the info symbols above.

The items are arrayed in a grid with repeating rows and columns set to take up a maximum of 30% parent width, and a minimum of slightly more than the width of the menu items.

The topbar is flexa row that lays out its children with small gap. The children are centered vertically and horizontally.

The action buttons belong to their own row with a small gap and padding.

The top bar is taller on phone dimensions to account for the bevel.

This text shrinks below a certain screen width to fit the container better

On phone and tablet dimensions, the cart icon will open a separate tab with the order summary.

On phone dimensions, there might only be one or two menu items per row. If there is only one column, the images will shrink by 50% to allow more items to fit on the screen.
